SPATE: A NAVIGATIONAL THEORY
OF NETWORKS

DEEP-POCKETS #1

The relation of your handwriting and typing exposes the content of efficiency in a world driven by the ever increasing compression of all things. Fake wood is more natural than an honest answer: lying reaffirms the truth based on negation only to move into a grey area. You are not excited? The potential of rusted ideas polished as a brand is the obsession of future-trending. 24/7 specs. You flip the script: house to the jacked sound of information overflow. Noise is controlled for the sake of our compromise called communication. Flip to the first: jack to the sound of overused eyeglasses lacking prescription, designed to make perfect vision appear unfashionable. The murals stored in the cloud become available on the screens of anyone willing to transgress experience as a virtual factor of lack. This is not your place, but a localized tweet. Refresh gives you, and everyone else, instant hope to experience something new: passive action becomes the foundation of a radical lifestyle.

A Navigational Theory of Networks

Spate: A Navigational Theory of Networks

We couldn't have been more happy to start the new Deep Pockets series with the highly artistic, creative, and jubilant work of Eduardo Navas.

Spate is an experimental, funny and deep reflection on networked media. It is composed with tweets written by the author over an extended period of time and repurposed into a text which studies media processes such as flowing, searching and trending and at the same time is a flow, a search, an illustration of trend.

New Longform from Agnieszka Zimolag

A Dream of an Algorithm

The latest longform by Agnieszka Zimolag glides through the emotional immersion of always on connectivity and reflects on how communication technologies manifest into personal identities. This essay courageously incorporates the emotional upheaval from continuously updating and chasing our optimum self whilst grounding an articulate position on the image and the self in the age of networked identities.
